In this white paper, we look at the changing world of identity provision. Digital identity is evolving from a "retrospective" model to an increasingly predictive one, based on behavioural data as much as traditional credential. There is also a shift from siloed credentials towards more transferable assertions of identity and attributes.

Theory and research on social identity complemented psychology's historical emphasis on personal identity (e.g., Erikson, 1968; Marcia, 1980). Whereas social identity refers to people's self-categorizations in relation to their group memberships (the "we"), personal identity refers to the unique ways that people define themselves as individuals (the "I"). For example, this might ...
