In most cases, you will create an ISO 9001 procedure for every process. Many companies write too many procedures when, in fact, they should be documenting these directives as more specific work instructions. When appropriate, create detailed ISO 9001 work instructions for each task that is needed to support each of your procedures. (A good rule of thumb is: if the procedure does not give enough guidance for someone to complete the task, create a work instruction.)
