Reflective practice is immediately useful to adult ESL practitioners who have limited time and resources to divide between teaching and professional development. Because it asks practitioners to make connections between what is happening in a specific context and their broader beliefs, it can be useful to those who move from site to site and teach in varied contexts.

It goes far beyond looking at exam grades or points in a spreadsheet: it's a detailed process that truly gets to the heart of your teaching. Reflective teaching can be done in private, but you can also get your colleagues to help. For starters, it can be about understanding what tasks and activities lead to good results. But, when done properly, it can help you to re-assess the beliefs, values and philosophies that underpin your practice.

Reflective practice is becoming an important feature of ESL/EFL teacher education programs worldwide. One way that may promote reflective practice for English as a foreign language (EFL) teachers is the formation of teacher development groups. This study sought to investigate in what ways regular group discussion promotes reflective thinking.
