Now, thanks to a research team from Kobe University in Japan, there's a new type of mammography machine that may change the way women view mammograms for the better. The new technique promises to be safer, more accurate, and less painful than a normal mammogram, which would be a huge leap forward for the industry.

New "Microwave Mammography" Promises to be Safer, More ...

It's so important that we make mammograms accessible to all women who need them. In Montana, every clinic that offers mammograms has at least one machine that is accessible to women with disabilities and mobility issues [3]. It's time for the rest of the country to follow their example. Wheelchair accessible mammography machines do exist.
